INFANTRY WEAPONS

With the second edition of Twilight: 2000, the combat system and small arms were radically changed. Unfortunately, this necessitated scrapping the old weapons statistics. When the revision was issued, we decided not to try to include all the new ratings in the basic rules, but to include a wide enough selection of weapons to allow referees to recreate important armies. We also decided to publish new ratings for small arms as soon as possible. This booklet is the result.

The appearance of Merc: 2000 and the imminent publication of Dark Conspiracy and Cadillacs & Dinosaurs means that players of these games (all of them based on the same basic system and thus using compatible weapons) will need a variety of weapons not necessary in the Twilight: 2000 situation. Infantry Weapons of the World addresses the needs of all of these games, in addition to serving as a basic resource for world small arms.

Corrections: In rating the weapons for this book, Frank and I took the opportunity to introduce a number of minor corrections, remove a few inconsistencies, and fine tune things a bit. These ratings are considered authoritative over the ratings in the basic game. One of the main differences was to increase damages for many pistol rounds, adjust some ranges for more realism, and introduce a little more distinction between some calibers (primarily between the .357 Magnum and .44 Magnum).

Folding Stocks: Weapons with folding stocks have two bulk ratings. The rating on the left is with the stock folded, the rating on the right is with it extended. Aimed fire is possible only with the stock extended. Folding or extending a stock counts as an action.

Quick Kill (New Rule): Any aimed shot which hits the chest or head may constitute a killing shot. Roll a D10. If the roll is less than or equal to the damage value of the shot, the target is instantly killed except on a roll of 10 exactly. If the hit was scored on an area protected by armor, roll versus the remaining damage value of the round. For automatic fire, roll only once per phase (regardless of the number of shots that hit). This rule should be applied only to NPCs. It is recommended that PCs who suffer a killing wound instead suffer enough damage to increase the wound level of the head or chest to at least serious if unwounded (and critical if already serious), and in addition take the normal damage inflicted by the round.

RATING FORMULAS

No matter how large we made this book, we would have to leave out some weapon or cartridge that someone, somewhere, considers vitally important. Rating firearms for Twilight: 2000 and related systems is a combination of calculation and referee fudging. We have, as a convenience to our referees and players, included some notes on the system of calculation we used.

You will need a reference work which gives muzzle velocity, bullet weight (that's the weight of the bullet only, not the weight of the cartridge) and the weapon's weight. You will also need to know a couple of things about the weapon itself, such as the presence of folding stocks, magazine capacity, and so on.

Rate of Fire (ROF): Rate of fire is based on the cyclical ROF of the weapon. The various types of action are described. Simply pick the one that comes closest (bolt action, semiautomatic, double-action revolver, single shot, etc.). If a fully automatic weapon has a burst limiter, use that number as the ROF. Otherwise, slow-firing automatic weapons (those with a cyclical ROF of less than 700) have a rate of fire of 5; fast automatic weapons (those with a cyclical ROF of between 701 and 1000) have a rate of fire of 10. Extremely high rates of fire get even higher ratings (1001 to 5000 gets 50, over 5000 gets 100).

Damage (Dam): To calculate damage, you need to know the weapon's muzzle energy. Muzzle energy is determined by the following:

$$E = MV^2$$

E is muzzle energy; M is the mass of the bullet in grams; and V is the muzzle velocity in thousands of feet per second (yes, I know we are mixing units of measure here, but it works). Once you have muzzle energy, you plug that into the damage formula:

$$D = (\sqrt{E} + 2) \times .66$$

D is the damage (Dam) value, and E is the muzzle energy determined above.

Penetration (Pen): There is no easy formula for penetration, so it's a judgment call. Compare the caliber of the round with one or more that have already been rated and extrapolate from those numbers.

Bulk (Blk): Bulk represents the handiness of the weapon and the speed with which it can be brought into action. Bulk is related to the length of the weapon, with a slight fudge factor. Weapons less than 15 cm are bulk 0; 16-30 cm are bulk 1; 31-45 cm are bulk 2; 46-75 cm are bulk 3; 76-90 cm are bulk 4; and 91 cm and up are bulk 5.

Magazine Capacity (Mag): For consistency, pick the most common magazine where there are several. We do not include the round in the chamber. The types of magazines are defined in the basic rules; simply find the description that fits (or comes closest).

Recoil (SS and Brst): The recoil value of a single shot is determined by the following formula:

$$R = \sqrt{E} + W$$

R is the recoil of a single shot; E is muzzle energy; and W is the weight of the loaded weapon in kilograms. In addition, weapons with particularly high muzzle energies have the following modifiers added to their recoil value:

\sqrt{E}	Modifier

After making this addition, double all single-shot recoils (except for pistols). For burst fire, plug the individual recoil value into a second formula:

$$B = (RN) + 2$$

B is the recoil of a burst; R is the recoil value of a single shot; and N is the number of bullets in the burst.

Other factors change recoil. A bipod halves the recoil of a weapon. A tripod halves the recoil of the weapon, and the weight of the tripod is added to the weight of the weapon when calculating recoil values. Pistols (only) have their recoil halved when a stock is attached (and extended, if it is a folding stock).

Range (Rng): There is no simple formula for range. For consistency, compare the range of the weapon to be rated (in meters) to a few similar weapons we have rated and extrapolate from those numbers. Remember to consider the difference between effective and maximum ranges (effective range is the range within which 50% or more of the rounds will strike a man-sized target, while maximum range is as far as the bullet will carry when the weapon is at full elevation). We use effective range as long range for our purposes and recalculate the table value from there (halved for medium, halved again for close, which is the value given on the table).

.44 Automag

.44 Automag (Semiautomatic): Clint Eastwood takes a break from his .44 Magnum to use the .44 Automag in one of his Dirty Harry films, making this rare firearm better known than most large-bore pistols.

Ammo: .44 Automagnum

Wt: 1.8 kg

Colt M1911A1

Colt M1911A1 (Semiautomatic): The standard military sidearm of the United States until the late 1980s, the M1911A1 has been supplanted as general issue by the 9mm M9. However, M9 procurement has never been sufficient to completely replace the M1911A1 in military use, and thus it is still encountered, especially in national guard units.

A number of civilian versions of the M1911A1 are made, including conversions to other calibers. The conversion to 10mm is among the most popular.

M14 Nambu

M14 Nambu (Semiautomatic): The most commonly issued Japanese military pistol in WWII, the Nambu is found throughout Asia, but is not common anywhere else (although many were brought home by American servicemen after WWII). The ammunition is unique, although a small quantity is still manufactured in the US for firearms enthusiasts.

Mauser M1896

Mauser M1896 (Semiautomatic): Known as the "Broomhandle" Mauser, the M1896 was the first successful semiautomatic pistol design. By the late 1980s, it had become a collector's item in the US and Europe, but was still in service with some police agencies throughout the rest of the world. The weapon has an integral internal magazine loaded from 10-round disposable stripper clips. The stock is hollow and can serve as a holster.

P-08 Luger/10.2

P-08 Luger/10.2 (Semiautomatic): The P-08 (Pistole 1908) Luger was one of the earliest self-loading pistol designs. Because it was adopted by the German Army in WWI and used through WWII, the Luger made numerous appearances in spy and war movies and is one of the most well-known pistols in the world. Thousands were made during the wars, and "look-alike" reproductions of the pistol were still being made in the 1990s.

Bushmaster

Bushmaster (Submachinegun): A not-altogether-successful attempt to develop a 5.56mm N submachinegun. The weapon's main problem is that the powder charge does not completely consume itself before the round leaves the barrel, making the muzzle flash extremely distracting. Also, its ambidextrous, nontraditional design makes it clumsy to inexperienced users.

Armington Laser Carbine Model 2

ALC-2 (Laser): The ALC-2 (Armington Laser Carbine Model 2) is extremely rare. Developed by Armington Laboratories as a testbed for a laser carbine, the ALC never entered full production, although an unknown number of prototypes (each essentially hand-made) were produced. The carbine incorporates a liquid-nitrogen cooling system (the N₂ bottle is plainly seen over the action) which vents itself after each shot, producing a tendril of "steam" that can be disconcerting to the uninitiated. The carbine is connected by a power cable to a rechargeable backpack filled with batteries and a capacitor which requires 30 seconds to recharge after a shot (leading to the weapon's nickname, "Blue Moon," since that was how often it could be fired—"once in a blue moon"). A pair of LEDs on the left side indicate the weapon's status (red for charging, green for charged). A discharged backpack requires six hours to recharge.

G11

G11 (Assault Rifle): A weapon of radical design and great effectiveness, the G11 replaced the G3 as the standard assault rifle and the Uzi as the standard submachinegun of the German Army. It is a bullpup-configuration weapon.

It differs from other combat rifles in that it fires caseless 4.7mm bullets. The compact nature of the weapon and low recoil of its round make it as handy as a submachinegun (even though it is a rifle).

Its caseless ammunition is extremely compact, allowing a large magazine capacity. Since there is no spent cartridge casing to eject, the rifle's action is completely enclosed and thus is very reliable in a dirty environment. However, there is no way to reload the round since it is completely consumed.

H&H .600 Nitro

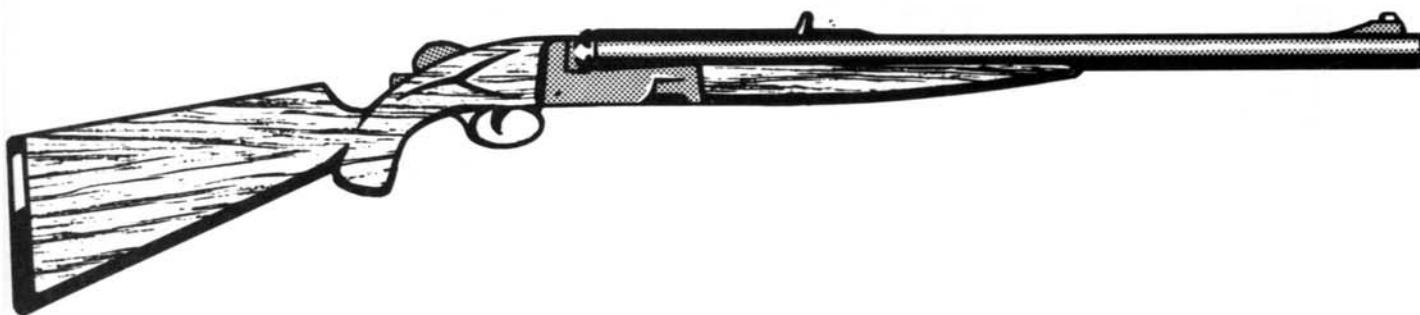

H&H .600 Nitro (Sporting Rifle): The word Nitro in the name of this big game rifle refers to that fact that it uses nitrocellulose (modern smokeless powder) instead of black powder—a necessary distinction at the time of the weapon's introduction in the late 19th century. The weapon is an old-model "double rifle," which means that it has two barrels side-by-side and breaks open like a double-barreled shotgun. The weapon and its cartridges (which are the size of cigars) are extremely rare.

M1 Carbine

M1 Carbine (Assault Rifle): The M1 carbine was developed as a replacement for the M1911A1 pistol during WWII. The intention was to give troops who could not always carry the heavier M1 Garand a weapon more powerful than a pistol to defend themselves with. After the war, many entered the surplus market, and thousands were given away as a part of the government's civilian marksmanship program.

AAT-52

AAT-52 (Machinegun): The standard machinegun of the French military, the AAT-52 is equipped with a bipod and can be fired from a tripod (NLT). The weapon's blowback extraction system tends to rip cartridge cases in half when extracting them, leaving a ring of brass stuck in the barrel. French troops have learned to overcome this deficiency by greasing the cartridge cases. Troops unfamiliar with the AAT-52, however, will be unaware of this precaution, and once the weapon's ready supply of ammo has been used up, the weapon may jam. (Roll 1D10 each combat turn the weapon is fired. A roll of 1 indicates the weapon is jammed.) A jam requires one full combat turn to clear.

Infantry WEAPONS of the World

Infantry Weapons of the World covers over 220 pistols, rifles, submachineguns, machineguns, and shotguns, each illustrated in full detail, and each fully rated for use with Twilight: 2000 and any other game using the same basic system (Merc: 2000, Dark Conspiracy, and Cadillacs and Dinosaurs).

This handbook includes all major military weapons in service with the world's armies in the year 2000, plus older weapons from past conflicts: WWII, WWI, and even some weapons of the colonial wars of the last century!

Weapons covered in this book include the Automag .44, Colt Detectives Special, HK 4, Mauser M1896, P-08 Luger (three varieties), Remington XP-100, Welrod .32, M-45 Carl Gustav, M3A1, Madson M50, S&W M76, VP-70, AR-7 Explorer, BM-59, H&H .600 Nitro Double Express Elephant gun, .45 Martini-Henry, Stoner 63 series (Carbine, rifle, LMG and HMG), H&K CAW, SPAS-15 and hundreds more.

Infantry Weapons of the World will prove a valuable resource for the modern weapons enthusiast (player or referee, gamer or nongamer).
